The Baltimore TeachingWell Residency Program

A groundbreaking new Master of Education (M.Ed.) program developed by Johns Hopkins University, responding to the needs of Baltimore City, the TeachingWell Residency Program is focused on creating an elite corps of master teachers equipped with skills and expertise in K-12 STEM instruction and culturally responsive teaching methods.

The Johns Hopkins Advantage

- 1+4 model: one-year degree program plus four added years of fully integrated classroom mentoring and career development
- A curriculum built on evidence-based research, ongoing mentorship, career life design, cognitive performance, and mental health support
- A high-demand credential backed by rigorous preparation
- Loan repayment program available for graduates who enter eligible teaching positions

Program Description

Through the unique TeachingWell residency model, students earn the Master of Education in one year, while gaining real-world experience in a classroom as part of a tight-knit cohort focused on ongoing mentoring, life design, cognitive performance, social/emotional learning, and teacher wellness.

This 39- to 42-credit master’s program offers a holistic, immersive learning experience to prepare candidates in the areas of Elementary Education, with a science, technology, engineering, and mathematics (STEM) focus, or Secondary Mathematics and Secondary Biology.

The MEd program features the following four specializations to choose from:

- Entrepreneurship Design Thinking
- Sustainability/Environmental Justice
- Adult Social Emotional Learning
- Research

Taking on a key role in addressing the critical STEM teacher shortage in Baltimore, graduates will receive an additional four years of mentorship and coaching after completing the program while serving as classroom teachers in eligible Baltimore schools. Financial support is available through an employment-based loan repayment assistance program that assists graduates who obtain eligible employment repay their graduate student loans after graduation.
